EDITORIAL

New trends of awareness that have emerged with the upheaval of traditional values and moralities seem to have blown apart the conventional boxes in which the various elements of the world, and even the universe, were once locked, sealed, and guarded with staunch complacency. Freud hinted even in the previous century that the realm of the psyche, "things are seldom as they seem." But even his brilliant science was fated to obsolescence by fears and premonitions that if the mind were liberated, the hoard of wild and bestial tendencies of man would be unleashed, bringing with them the doom of civilization, or more accurately, society as we know it. The realm of sex, of course, was that most potent and dangerous territory from which the supposed phantoms of destruction were to emerge.

But in the present time, the dread violence that traditional literature equates with the releasing of the full potential of man's sexual domain may seem as primitive a superstition as are the basis of some of man's earliest taboos. We seemed to have learned that man is indeed a creature of great beauty, whose freedom enhances and nourishes this innate beauty, and the repression of which is indeed the true source of violence, horror, and destruction. The love of man for man, the demi-urge of our ideal of beauty, is the source of all compassion, mercy, and love.

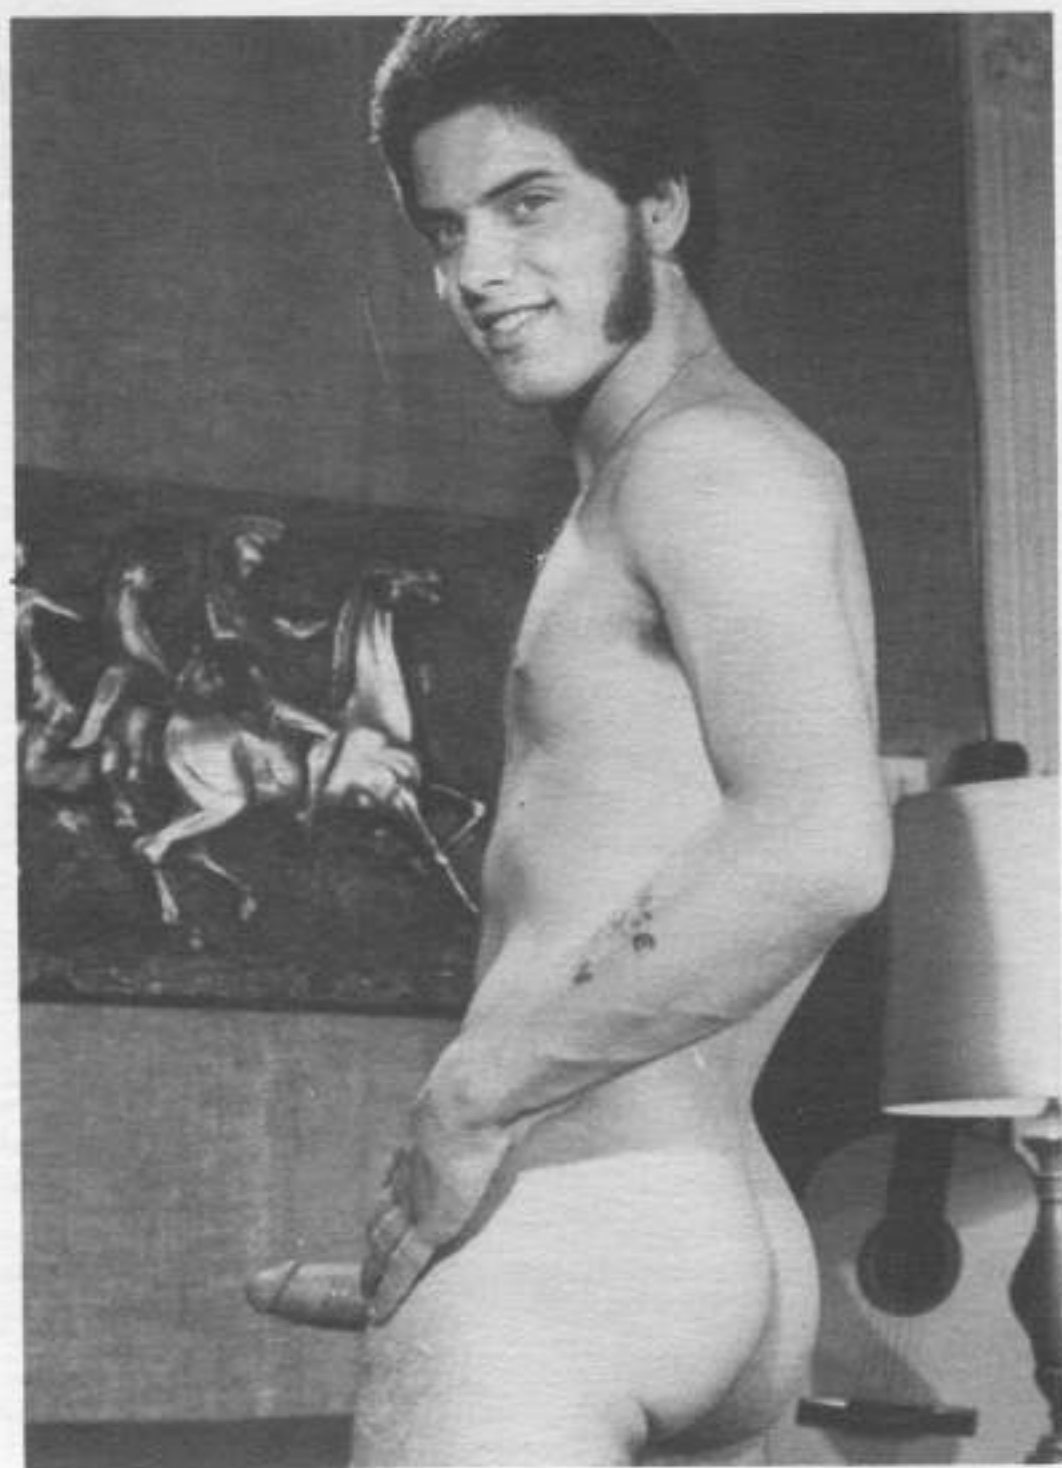

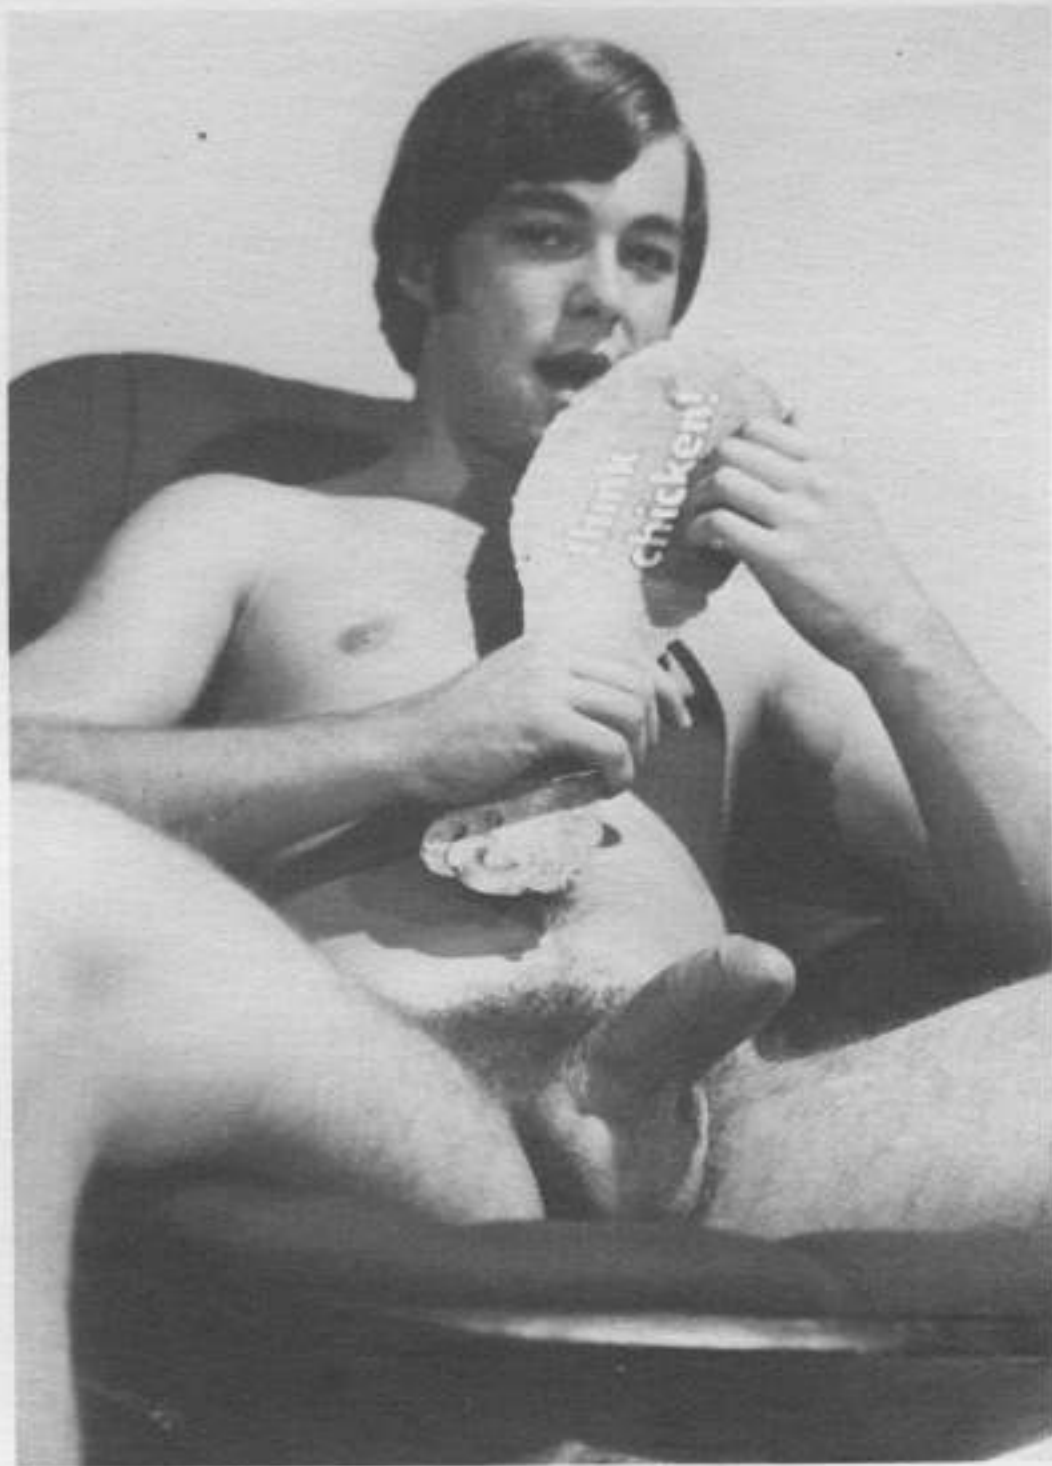

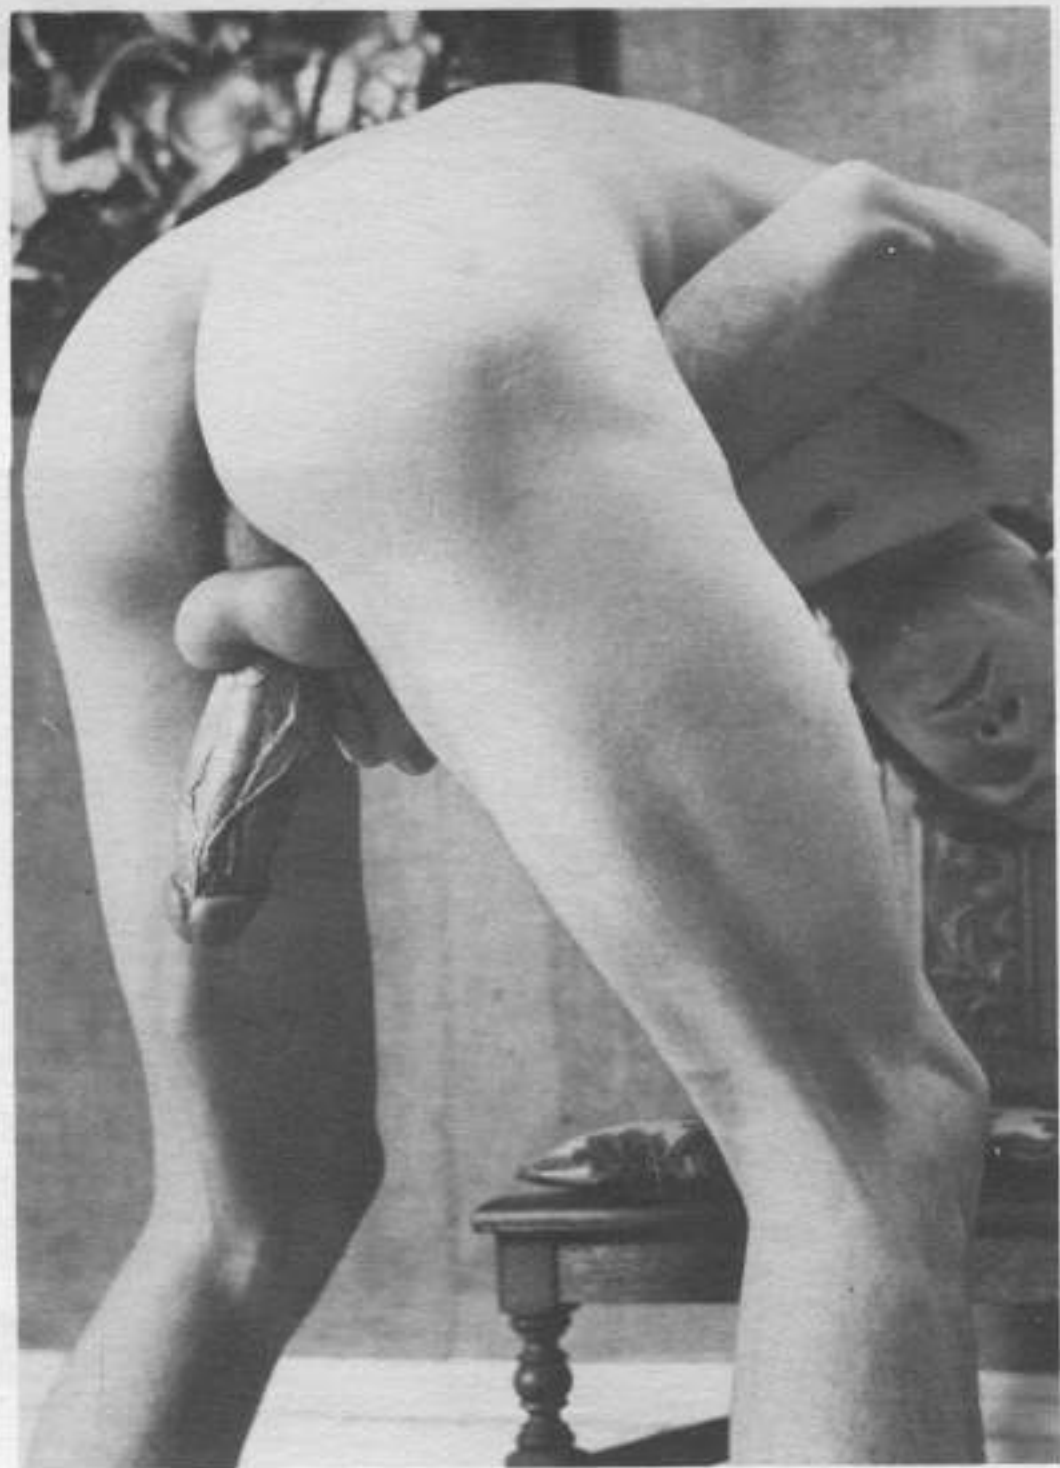

And because man is a physical being, it is not at all startling that some may find the urge of love to follow forms of outward expression, as in the physical love of man for man which some still deem the most perverse of human phenomenon. Many now reject the admonitions of the traditional moralists and are free to explore the full gamut of experiences, with no holes barred. Ecstasy is too compelling a goal for man to shut select doors of experience, and to his own loss.

Many have tried the route of sublimation. True, the great poetry of masculine love may have been the offspring. But negative sublimation has, by the same token, only resulted in war and slaughter. So let those who regard the human form as indeed the image of divine beauty pursue, without fear, the new ideals which, we hope, will emerge from the ruins of the old.
